This one of the most beautiful stories of how good surrounded evil and drove it out. Instead of going into tragic detail about the atrocities that took place during the Holocaust, it puts human faces, human feelings and a very personal account of one good man's successful mission to save lives. In 1940, Hiroki Sugihara, then 5 was living in Lithuania in a Japanese community. His younger brother Chiaki, 3 and infant brother Haruki were happily unaware of the strife and trauma taking place in the world. One young boy changed that. One night, a small boy in need of money approached Hiroki's father on the street. He gave the boy some money to buy what he needed. To show his appreciation, the boy invited the Sugiharas to his home to celebrate Hanukkah. During the early part of WWI, Chiune Sugihara was a diplomat representing Japan. The war literally came to his door one night when crowds of people, facing certain death came to the Sugihara home, seeking help. Hiroki's mother tells him that the people would be "killed or taken away by some very bad men" unless the family helped them. Hiroki begged his father to save them. Chiune Sugihara invited several men to meet with him inside. There they drew up a plan for Sugihara to secure visas to help the people escape from Lithuania. Sugihara told them that although he could only issue a few visas and that in order to do so he would have to get permission from the Japanese government. Sugihara approached the government, requesting those visas. Each time he was turned down. Time was running out, so he made the decision to go ahead and issue those visas on his own because not doing so would be "to disobey God" instead of disobeying the government.
