Customer Reviews

We used this in my intro to psych. I think the authors did a good job showing multiple sides to different theories. A nice, easy read that holds your attention, especially when read chapter to chapter over a semester. They covered quite a bit of material, giving actual examples and references without getting dry.

Exploring Psychology and Christian Faith
By Paul Moes and Donald Tellinghuisen
The Christian faith and Psychology do not usually sit together. Moes and Tellinghuisen have written a textbook at undergraduate level for studying the topic. They address five Biblical themes about man and explain how that fits around modern psychology. The work is comprehensive, presents arguments supporting different viewpoints. An ideal textbook for Christians studying psychology. Reviewed by Heath Henwood. Copy received via NetGallery in exchange for an honest review. Psychology in our era has come to dominate so much of our lives. Almost everyone who has lived in the modern era knows some things about it. The fight between psychology and the church has also not been settled definitely yet. As someone who's reading psychology at the undergraduate level, I've always wanted to think Christianly about what I'm studying. Currently, I'm tilting towards the biblical counselling track, but still open to listen to what others have to say. So it was with delight when I saw the opportunity to read this book. Paul Moes & Donald Tellinghuisen has written a book that aims to be an introduction for Christians studying psychology. Moes and Tellinghuisen first introduces the reader to five themes that the Bible teaches us about what man truly is. These five themes then build the basis and foundation of how the authors (and the readers) will think Christianly about psychology. They would be consistently revisited and reviewed as the authors bring the readers through the various chapters. Moes and Tellinghuisen does a comprehensive work and covers most of the topics that an undergraduate will cover in their studies. They were covered in depth to allow the readers time and space to learn and think about the topics. Also, Moes and Tellinghuisen constantly help the readers think Christianly about what is usually thought in the textbooks. What Moes and Tellinghuisen does well, is they do not give an one-sided approach to the topics. Often they are able to present the topics succinctly yet able to give an accurate picture of what they are about. However, there are some areas of improvement too. First, I found little statistics inside the book, far too often I find myself studying a lot of statistics that studies use to validate their results. Next, I found the book not very balanced, I found chapters 14, 15 and 16 exceptionally well written as compared to the rest of the book, future editions should endeavour to present the rest of the chapters as exceptional as the last 3 chapters were. Lastly, although the authors constantly referred to their five themes, I find that more biblical support or if certain relevant Bible verses can be referred to at the appropriate chapters would make it even better. What will make this book even better would be a short chapter either at the front or the back on the various perspectives Christians approach psychology. This would be the most appropriate place for a student to explore and gain valuable insights into the different schools of thoughts. Having said all that, I would no doubt gladly recommend this book to anyone who intends to study psychology in the future. If you intend or are currently studying psychology, this would be a good introduction for you. Be prepared to soak and learn all you can from this book before you embark onto your studies. Rating: 4 / 5 Disclaimer: I was given this book free from the publisher in exchange for an honest review.

Read this book as a part of a psychology and Christian faith class, definitely provided good insights and ways of "blending" a science based subject with Christianity.

Excellent book - would love to use it as a text in a class, if I taught one in this area - maybe for our capstone class? Well written and easy to understand.

excellent

Awesome

Came in just as described thank you so much!
