Customer Reviews

Lindsay Barrett George creates beautiful illustrations for this wonderful nature book. It's a lovely book to sit and read together--she asks "who's been here?" There are hints--a crushed leaf or a pawprint. The next page reveals the answer. Carefully rendered, these illustrations and the puzzles they pose will definitely draw in any child, and inspire more than a few family nature walks, as children enjoy looking for their own natural mysteries. I highly recommend any books by this author/illustrator.

I adore this series, but this one has one really graphic image that can disturb the target age group, so just a caveat for the younger set or older children sensitive to graphic images (my daughter is four, and I skip over the image of the foxes eating a live woodchuck that shows a look of terror on the woodchuck's face). Other than this (depending upon your philosophy) the book is exquisite.

A delightful read for young children (and Grammys too!) who enjoy the outdoors and all the discoveries to be made when taking a walk. The pictures are wonderful and the large print text is easy for beginning readers as well as for those who may have vision difficulties. My grandson and I have thoroughly enjoyed this adventure together!

A sweet and simple story in a beautiful book for kids who are observant. Map at the front of the book shows the route the children walk, all the way to the surprise at the end. We liked Lindsay Barrett George's "Box Turtle at Long Pond" book, and this book showcases her signature style of illustrating the natural world. I live in the Arizona desert. Any chance for a book about a high pine forest, Mrs. George? I'll keep my fingers crossed).

My two sons enjoy predicting which animal is being described on every other page. Even though we've read it 5 times since we received it, the boys now enjoy anticipating which animal is next and they feel smart knowing all of the animals! There's a couple gory parts that show animals that have killed other animals, but I guess it shows the food chain realistically.
